The Chinese University Offers New Doctoral Programme in Anthropology

The Anthropology Department of The Chinese University will offer its first PhD programme this September.

The new postgraduate programme will focus on the study of Chinese and East Asian socio-cultural patterns, using comparative and interdisciplinary approaches. It will accept both local and overseas students to do research on Chinese anthropology, and prominent professors or readers from related disciplines at the University will be invited to serve as joint supervisors for students. Visiting posts will also be established to invite eminent anthropologists to teach at the University.

Financial aid is available to qualified candidates in the form of graduate assistantships funded by the University, scholarships from exchange programmes, and grants from the Department's research projects. On-going projects include the South China programme, the Hakka project and the Lantau Island project. The Department has set up exchange and joint research programmes with the University of London, Yale, Zhongshan University, and Xiamen University, and is planning to develop new linkages with other academic institutions in China, Taiwan, Japan and France.

Application forms are now available from the Graduate School at The Chinese University, and applications should be filed before February 29, 1992. For further details on admission requirements, please contact the Department of Anthropology at Tel: 609-7670/609-7677.
