Engineering Festival

The Engineering Society of The Chinese University of Hong Kong is holding an "Engineering Festival" from March 22 to April 4 on campus.

The Theme of the Festival this year is "Engineering in the 90's". Three seminars and an exhibition are to be held during the festival period. The aim of the Festival is to introduce high-tech developments in engineering and explore the impact of advanced engineering technology on our everyday lives.

The climax of the Festival is marked by a three-day exhibition to take place from March 28 to 30 at the Lady Shaw Building. An opening ceremony of the exhibition will be held on Thursday, March 28, 1991 at 11:00 am. The ceremony will be officiated by Professor George Fan, Administrative Dean of the Engineering Programme. The main topics of the exhibition are communications, computers, artificial intelligence, applications of software and networking.

In the exhibition, apart from research works of the teachers and students of the Engineering Programme, the most advanced electronic and computer products will be displayed. The highlights of the exhibition include demonstration of the second generation cordless telephone and live shows of satellite television. The new cordless telephone is introduced to the education sector for the first time. The live broadcasting of satellite television, on the other hand, will undoubtedly be the most fascinating programme of the Festival.

The exhibits will also include image processing, multivendors networking softwares of CAD/CAM on workstations, neural networks and expert systems. Above all else, visitors are welcome to try using the newly-installed workstations and Macintoshes too. To those who are interested in electronic and computer technology, this event will be both informative and entertaining.
